Dear Peggy,

Some career paths are more difficult than others, and certainly public speaking is one of the toughest. I know you've had a tough time securing clients lately. But may I share a secret with you? I have heard many great speakers in my career — those who are highly paid to stand before groups of businesspeople and motivate them or instruct them on some useful subject. You are as good as many I have heard. You can succeed in this business! The key is persistence. If a prospect chooses another speaker, send 10 more letters to potential clients offering your services. Success in business is basically a numbers game. If the numbers are high enough — the number of cold calls you make, or letters you send — you will get the response you need to make a good living in your field. If you don't give up, you will make it. Of that I have no doubt.

Sincerely,

Bill

We were driving to the movies, and as luck would have it, we ended up behind a vehicle stopped in the middle of the turn lane. We waited behind the vehicle, assuming car trouble was the culprit. Then we noticed the passenger of the vehicle exit out of the passenger's side door. He started walking away from the car. Unexpectedly, the driver of the vehicle exited out of the driver's side, and started yelling at the passenger to get back in the vehicle. When the passenger refused to acknowledge the driver, the driver began following the passenger, leaving the car parked in the middle of the turn lane and blocking not just us, but several other cars waiting to turn. Do you ever wonder, with progress increasing on all fronts, why the human entity itself remains a mystery? In the past 2,400 years, great minds have diligently tried to demystify man, yet many aspects of the human remain unanswered. Some of this failure to answer stems from the fact that great thinkers have often been fascinated by a particular mental faculty of the human and have tried to understand the whole being through this single mental element alone. That element, of course, is human intellect. Being mesmerized by this, many continue to disregard another mental force, that drives our conduct at all levels much more forcefully than intellect does. Ignoring this mighty force has created a missing link in most of their works, and renders them inconclusive, if not misleading. Thus, the human enigma continues to present itself in many aspects of human affairs. Instinct is that mighty force, and correct treatment of human instinct is essential in accurately understanding humankind.

Keeping permanent vegetation in fields can greatly reduce soil erosion, stabilize water availability in the field, and provide a habitat for wildlife. Adopting agroforestry practices — deliberately growing trees around cultivated crops — can achieve this. Depending on how trees are arranged throughout a field, wind erosion can be drastically reduced. Also, snow can be distributed evenly over a field and prevented from blowing away (thus retaining moisture for planting). Trees provide refuge for wildlife away from the highly disturbed cropped area. These undisturbed areas may shelter pest predators and pollinators (such as leaf-cutting bees). In addition to dampening environmental stresses, agroforestry systems can improve yields of agricultural crops. One concern about agroforestry practices is that it takes land out of crop production. However, this loss of yield may be counteracted by the favorable conditions that trees can provide for crops.

The hunt for suitable sites is an issue for hydroelectric power. The necessary reservoirs require large tracts of land, and building hydroelectric dams often displaces local populations. And if you compare the surface area of these reservoirs with the power they help to generate, hydroelectricity frequently performs less efficiently than tapping the sun's rays directly. Many dams achieve only a tenth of the wattage per square meter offered by solar cells. Hydroelectric reservoirs are also less environmentally friendly than you might think because of the gases they give off. Rotting plants often release considerable volumes of methane — a more powerful greenhouse gas than carbon dioxide — into the atmosphere. Another drawback is that capacity declines over time because a great deal of sediment is left behind in the reservoir. And the immense weight of all that water can affect the geological balance in unpredictable ways, increasing the likelihood of earthquakes.

In a study done by Susan Harter, professor of psychology at the University of Denver, children in a classroom were given a series of problems that varied in difficulty. Some problems were very easy, some easy, others hard, and still others very hard. The experimenter monitored each student's expressed pleasure (through smiling) after solving each problem. As a result, an inverted-U pattern emerged in which students rarely smiled after solving the very easy and easy problems, smiled most after solving the moderately difficult problems, and smiled only mildly following success on the very hard problems. That is, based on how much or how little the children smiled, pleasure was greatest following success during moderate challenge. Easy tasks fail to involve the need for competence; moderately difficult undertakings fully involve the competence need; and very difficult tasks generate too much anxiety and frustration for students to enjoy them, even when they successfully solve them.

Planet's Gravitational Pulls

The graph above shows the gravitational pulls of the Earth and the other seven planets. All the numbers, which indicate the strength of each planet's gravitational pull, are rounded off to one decimal place. ① Of all the planets, our home planet of Earth has the fourth strongest gravitational pull, which is 9.8 m/s^2 . ② Venus has a slightly lower gravitational pull than Earth with a pull of 8.9 m/s^2 , while Saturn has a slightly higher gravitational pull than Earth with a pull of 10.4 m/s^2 . ③ Mercury and Mars are the two planets with the weakest gravitational pull of all the planets. ④ Of all the planets, Jupiter exerts by far the greatest gravitational pull, which is over three times stronger than what we experience here on Earth. ⑤ The gravitational pull of Neptune is 11.2 m/s^2 , which is 2.5 m/s^2 stronger than that of Uranus.

25 vampire finch에 관한 다음 글의 내용과 일치하지 않는 것은?

The vampire finch is a small bird native to the Galápagos Islands, with the males being primarily black and the females grey with brown streaks. This bird is most famous for its unusual diet. The vampire finch occasionally feeds by drinking the blood of other birds, chiefly blue-footed boobies, pecking at their skin with their sharp beaks until blood is drawn. Curiously, the boobies do not offer much resistance against this. It has been believed that this behavior evolved from the pecking behavior that the finch used to clean parasites from the feathers of the bird. The finches also feed on eggs, stealing them just after they are laid and rolling them (by pushing with their legs and using their beak as a pivot) into rocks until they break. The vampire finch is endangered, being a small-island endemic. The vampire finch species collectively form a good example of Charles Darwin's theory of natural selection.

Civilized people have learned the hard way that a handful of evil individuals can often cause more death and destruction than an invading army. 31 I remember one extremely busy time in my life where for about a five-month period I was staying up until 2:00 or 3:00 A.M. every night to finish a project. I'd wake up to my alarm clock in the morning (which I had set quite early so I could exercise) only to reach over, turn it off, and go back to sleep. Since I was getting so little sleep at the time, I'd justify what I was doing by telling myself that I needed the sleep more than the exercise. After I had done this for a time, I started thinking, Why am I setting this alarm so early? I know I'm not going to get up to exercise when it goes off. Why am I even doing this? Not only had this repeated behavior weakened my self-confidence, it had become _____. 32 One clear weekend afternoon I drove across the Golden Gate Bridge and up to Sonoma County with Bill Schultz, a close friend visiting from the East Coast. We were on a quest for a restaurant where he had eaten a unique dessert fifteen years before — a strawberry milkshake inside a chocolate bag. Bill remembered both the taste and the unique look of the milkshake, but it was _____ that intensified his longing. The day he encountered the dessert had been a special one. Nearing the end of an adventurous, cross-country road trip, he was celebrating with an outdoor meal among friends in a California vineyard. Marriage was on his horizon. 33 It's not just sad or tragic events that leave people focused on the past. Sometimes we dwell on the past as a way to distract ourselves from the present. Perhaps you know that forty-year-old former high school quarterback who still squeezes into his varsity jacket and talks about his "old glory days." It can be tempting to fixate on how much easier or happier life was "back then." You may even begin to regret some of the decisions you made that landed you where you are today and say things like "If I hadn't dropped out of college, I'd have a job I love"; or "If I hadn't agreed to move to a new city, I'd still have a good life." The truth is, we don't know what life would have had in store for us had we not made those choices. But it's easy for us to imagine that _____. [3점]

The sense of “who you are” derived from work is intertwined with the “proof” provided by the money one earns. We are suspicious, and even dismissive, of money gained without hard work.

- (A) Their instant wealth makes them anomalies: they don't truly belong with the rich, nor do they fit in any longer with their peers. We tend to forget the names of lottery winners within a day or so and never hear from them again.
- (B) Interestingly, we look at game show winners differently. When Ken Jennings won seventy-four consecutive rounds of the quiz show Jeopardy, he became an instant celebrity. Unlike a lottery winner's, however, Jennings's star didn't fade immediately.
- (C) For instance, we have little respect for those who gain sudden wealth through the lottery. Americans don't regard this as “real” money because it isn't earned. Lottery winners prove nothing by winning the lottery, except that they were very fortunate.

In many ways, our obsession with youth is like that mask.

The French mime Marcel Marceau does a very funny routine in which he pantomimes putting on a mask of a smiling face. (①) A minute or so into the routine, he attempts to take off the mask and finds that it is stuck. (②) As he struggles and writhes to free himself of the mask, the smile remains plastered to his face. (③) At the end, he slumps, defeated, but his synthetic smile is still there. (④) Artificial treatments such as plastic surgery, Botox, and hair replacement give us the luster of youth, but they come at a high price and are often accompanied by pain and discomfort. (⑤) Peppy cars and youthful clothing are exciting and wonderful if we really connect with them, but can make us feel like frauds if we employ them only to create the illusion of youth.

Surprised, the umpire allowed Roddick to overrule him and the point was awarded to Verdasco.

In the third round of the 2005 Italia Masters tournament in Rome, Andy Roddick was playing with Fernando Verdasco from Spain. It was match point in favor of Roddick. (①) When Verdasco hit his second serve, the line judge called the ball “out” and the crowd began to cheer for Roddick. (②) Verdasco moved towards the net to shake hands, as if the match were over. (③) But Andy Roddick didn't accept the point. (④) Instead, he said that the ball was “in” and called the umpire's attention to a slight indentation on the clay court which showed that the ball had landed on — not beyond — the line. (⑤) In a game not typically played on the honor system, but on the umpire's calls, Roddick had made a call against himself and he went on to lose the match.

To keep their cars from being stolen off the street, a lot of people lock the steering wheel with an anti-theft device like the Club. By using a visible Club, you are explicitly telling a potential thief that your car will be hard to steal. The implicit signal, meanwhile, is that your neighbor's car — the one without a Club — is a much better target. So your Club produces a negative externality for your non-Club-using neighbor in the form of a higher risk that his car will be stolen. A device called LoJack, meanwhile, is in many ways the opposite of the Club. It is a small radio transmitter, not much larger than a deck of cards, hidden somewhere in or beneath the car. But if the car is stolen, the police can remotely activate the transmitter and follow its signal straight to the car. Actually, for every additional percentage point of cars that have LoJack in a given city, overall thefts fall by as much as 20 percent.

While a device like the Club may cause non-Club-users to be theft ____ (A) ____, installing a device called LoJack can ____ (B) ____ car thefts in the city.

Laughter is a form of positive emotion that can influence your brain, heart, and blood vessel function. In a unique study, researchers from the University of Maryland found that while watching funny movies, such as There's Something About Mary, nineteen out of twenty people had increased blood flow to the heart. Conversely, watching stressful movies, such as the opening scene from Saving Private Ryan, decreased blood flow in fourteen out of twenty people. Specifically, blood flow decreased by about 35 percent after experiencing stress, while blood flow increased by about 22 percent after laughing, which is equivalent to what happens after a fifteen- to thirty- minute workout.

The ability of blood vessels to expand is known as vasodilation and is a sign of heart health. Decreased blood flow limits the body's ability to react to physical or emotional stress and results in an increased risk of heart attacks and strokes. Past studies have found that stress hormones like adrenalin and cortisol, which are released when a person is stressed, may harm the body by suppressing the immune system and constricting blood vessels. _____, laughing causes the body to release chemicals called endorphins, which may counteract the effects of stress hormones and cause blood vessels to expand. In a similar manner, laughing may also boost the immune system and reduce inflammation, which is thought to increase the risk of various health problems.

My run slowed to a jog as we approached the gate for our flight to Paris. The plane was still there, but the door to the Jetway was shut. The gate agents were quietly sorting tickets. They had already retracted the hood connecting the Jetway to the airplane door. "Hi, we're on this flight!" I panted. "Sorry," said the agent. "We're done boarding." "But our connecting flight landed just ten minutes ago. They promised us they would call ahead to the gate." "Sorry, we can't board anyone after they've closed the door."

(B)

The engine whine softened and we heard the gate agent's phone ring. She turned to us, wide-eyed. "Grab your stuff!" she said. "The pilot said to let you on!" Our vacation restored, we clutched each other joyously, snatched our bags, waved to the pilots, and tumbled down the Jetway to our plane.

(C)

Then I led my friend to the center of the window right in front of the cockpit. We stood there, in plain sight, my entire being focused on the pilot, hoping to catch his eye. One of the pilots looked up. He saw us standing forlornly by the window. I looked him in the eye, plaintively, pleadingly. I let my bags slump by my feet. We stood there for what seemed an eternity. Finally, the pilot's lips moved and the other pilot looked up. I caught his eye, as well, and he nodded.

(D)

My friend and I walked to the window in disbelief. Our long weekend was about to fall to pieces. The plane waited right before our eyes. The sun had set, and the pilots' faces were bathed in the glow of their instrument panel. The whine of the engines intensified and a guy with lighted batons walked onto the runway. I thought for a few seconds.
